Our Foundational Questions

We are committed to exploring, engaging and sustaining change in the workforce by embedding consideration and analysis of these key questions in all workforce activities:

- Volunteerism – how does this activity apply to and benefit volunteerism within the agency?
- Diversity and inclusion – how does this activity build an inclusive and diverse workforce which better reflects the community we serve?
- Risk management – how does this activity contribute to the mitigation of QFES people risks?
- Change management, connection and integration – how does this activity connect to others to ensure an integrated approach to continuous improvement across systems, people and processes?

Our Workforce Environment

New ways of working – paid staff and volunteers are seeking new ways of working with increased flexibility, integration, adaptivity, collaboration and interaction with technology.

Mental health and wellbeing – increasing operational impacts of fatigue, burnout and psychological stress on emergency services personnel (paid and volunteer) is anticipated to continue with the ongoing impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic and longer, more intense weather-related events.

Changing volunteer landscape – changes in patterns of volunteerism within Australia including shifting demographics, increase in desire of people to volunteer and expectation of more flexible arrangements are challenging the concept and structure of traditional volunteerism.

Climate change – increase in demand for QFES services through a changing climate with increasingly severe, overlapping and longer weather-related events.

Pandemic response – the impact of COVID-19 will continue beyond 2021 with closed international borders, vaccination rates and the impact of emerging variants of the virus. Economic and social impacts from the pandemic will also continue until these issues are addressed.

Population and demographics – shift in population distribution including the ongoing challenge of providing services in the most decentralised state in Australia.

Emergency and disaster management – limited seasonal windows for planning disaster and longer protracted emergency responses.

Trust and expectations – increase in community expectations from QFES.

Information security – requirements for increased information management maturity and improved practices.

Digital agenda – increase in robotics, artificial intelligence, automation and other technology for monitoring and responding to emergencies.
